1. As President John F. Kennedy declared on May 17, 1961 in his address before the Canadian Parliament in Ottawa, "...we share more than a common border. We share a common heritage, traced back to those early settlers who traveled from the beachheads of the Maritime Provinces and New England to the far reaches of the Pacific Coast. ...we share common values from the past, a common defense line at present, and common aspirations for the future-our future, and indeed the future of all mankind. day. Further, they share a common heritage resulting in a shared belief in the basic ideals of freedom, the rule of law, equal rights, and security. With respect to immigration, while both nations vary slightly in the type and number of immigrants each admits, as well as having somewhat different motivations for admitting one immigrant over another, both Canada and the United States share a common view of basic immigration goals.

Much of the present international border between the two nations originates with the Treaty of Paris in 1783 and the subsequent Treaty of 1818 between Great Britain and the United States. With the exception of current disagreements regarding the boundaries in the Arctic region, the border between Canada and the United States is well marked, stable, and undisputed. Today, both nations monitor the border for everything from the movement of drugs and weapons to air and water pollution. Moreover, in the wake of September 11, 2001, there have been vast changes along the border. One of the clearest changes is the increased use of passports and travel documentation for travelers in an effort to more carefully monitor every person who crosses between the two countries. In October 2006, however, the individual detained at the border was not an international terrorist, drug smuggler, or petty gunrunner. Rather, the man detained by Canadian officials was a high school English teacher from Buffalo, New York.

In October 2006, Mr. Malcolm Watson, a United States citizen and convicted sex offender was, according to the international media, “exiled” to Canada as a term of his plea agreement entered into in an Erie County, New York courtroom. This article chroniicles Mr. Watson’s story, from the criminal acts that brought him before a judge in Cheektowaga, New York to Canada’s outcry that this sexual offender was being “dumped” in Canada by the United States.14

Part I outlines the facts underlying the events leading to Mr. Watson’s arrest in the United States and the subsequent court actions taken in both the United States and Canada. Part II outlines the relevant domestic and international legal issues arising from this case. From the age of consent laws underlying the story to the alleged exile of an American citizen, the story was international news and raised interesting legal issues. In essence, the Watson Affair is another unique tale in the Canadian-American relationship and not only exposes some of the subtle differences between the two nations, but also raises new issues in immigration and citizenship law.

I. THE FACTS BEHIND WATSON’S “EXILE”

Malcolm Watson is a natural born American citizen who taught at a prestigious all girls school in Buffalo, New York.15 The thirty-five year-old Mr. Watson, however, lived across the border in St. Catherines, Ontario, Canada with his wife and three children.16 Each weekday, he crossed the international border and made the short journey to and from the American girls school where he taught. As a United States citizen and as a Landed Immigrant17 in Canada, he had little difficulty entering either country. In April 2006, however, Buffalo Police discovered Mr.

Mr. Watson’s wife and her child are not U.S. citizens, however, and could be delayed or prevented from joining Mr. Watson in the United States should he be forced to serve jail time there or simply be denied entry to Canada.
17. See § II(b)(i) infra; A “Landed Immigrant” is the term used by Canadian immigration authorities to describe a non-citizen permanent resident. There are several ways to become a Canadian permanent resident, such as a refugee, skilled worker, or for family reunification. Needless to say, the reaction in Canada, fueled by the media,25 was swift and harsh. The Premier of Ontario, Mr. Dalton McGuinty, declared in the provincial legislature that “it is certainly not a precedent that we are prepared to accept.”26 Recognizing that the Canadian federal government had the responsibility for handling an “international issue like this,” he declared his provincial government’s support in preventing other “jurisdictions south of the border that might want to use Ontario as a dumping ground for convicted felons.”27

After an October 25, 2006, appearance in a Cheektowaga courtroom, Mr. Watson attempted to return to Canada. Canadian Border Services Agency officials, however, detained Mr. Watson whom they identified as a danger to the public and on suspicion that he had contravened the Canadian Immigration and Refugee Protection Act.28 Federal Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day29 promptly wanted Mr. Watson declared inadmissible to Canada and shipped back to the United States. Mr. Watson was released several days later after a Canadian Immigration Judge declared he was not a high-risk offender.

After reviewing the evidence and convening an admissibility hearing on Monday, December 18, 2006, Canadian Immigration and Refugee Board member Ms. Liz Lasowski declared Mr. Watson was in a position of trust and authority over his victim. Consequently, she ordered Mr. Watson to be deported. Mr. Watson's Canadian attorney, Mr. Stephen Green, immediately appealed the decision and it may be a year before the appeal is heard.

In summarizing the role of a member of the Immigration and Refugee Board's general role and duties, Mr. Clive Joakim, a retired member of the Immigration and Refugee Board, noted that a member of the Canadian Immigration and Refugee Board has the power to convene a hearing into the merits of a case that has been referred by the Immigration. The member decides on whether or not he will need the assistance of a Refugee Protection Officer (RPO) at the hearing. The RPO is a staff person responsible for researching the file, placing on the file all the relevant documentary evidence and outlining the issues. The member is responsible for approving the list of issues that may include such things as identity, political affiliation, credibility, internal flight alternative, exclusion, state protection, and others. Next, upon reviewing the file, the member may decide to dispense with the services of the RPO for the actual hearing. Generally, if there is the prospect of a lot of questions on credibility, it is better for the RPO to be present asking the questions so that the member can find it easier to not enter the fray and maintain his impartiality. However, in practice most experienced members are very familiar with the country conditions and the type of story being presented so that he may prefer to go it alone and question the person himself.

II. THE THORNY LEGAL ISSUES – AGE OF CONSENT LAWS, IMMIGRATION, & CITIZENSHIP

The Watson case abounds with both domestic and international legal questions. Whether it is the different age of consent laws between the two countries or the interplay of domestic Canadian and American immigration and citizenship laws, the case is unique in many ways. As one of Malcolm Watson’s earliest attorneys declared soon after the media scrum began, Mr. Watson faced becoming a man like Alfred Dreyfus in France during the 1890s.37

a. Age of Consent Laws – Canada vs. the United States

The facts of the Watson Affair expose differences in the age of consent laws between the two nations and were the basis for the subsequent exile row. In Canada, the Watson Affair renewed the debate concerning age of consent for sexual relations.38 Currently, Canadian federal law criminalizes sexual contact with a person under the age of fourteen unless the sexual relationship springs from a relationship of authority, trust, or dependency.39 Accor-ingly, many officials in the United States, where Mr. Watson was deemed a Level 1 sex offender, question Canadian anger since Mr. Watson was charged with engaging in sexual activity with a fifteen year old. After all, Mr. Watson’s New York victim was one year older than Canada’s age of consent requirement.

In Canada, the Criminal Code governs criminal conduct and the resulting punishment for offences. Specifically, the Criminal Code of Canada states that anyone over the age of fourteen may consent to sexual activity. In 1984, with the publication of the Sexual Offences Against Children Report, also known as the “Badgley” Report, it was recognized that Canada should give greater protection to children under the age of fourteen. As such, legislation was later passed criminalizing sexual activity involving a person between the ages of fourteen and seventeen where there was a “relationship of authority, trust, or dependency” between the participants. Such relationships include parents, teachers, babysitters, employers, and the like. As Professor Jeremy Patrick has noted, the Supreme Court of Canada decision in R. v. Audet outlines such a sexual relationship between a teacher and his student. In Audet, a twenty-two year-old high school

Gwendolyn Landolt, Canadian Children Targeted on Internet, STRATFORD BEACON-HERALD, Aug. 13, 2004 at 4 (arguing that Canada, “as one of the most wired countries” in the world, should do more to protect Canadian children from on-line or cross border sexual predators by, among other things, raising the age of consent to at least 16 in Canada); Sean McKibbon, Gay Pornographer Going Home, OTTAWA SUN, Nov. 17, 2005, at 11 (noting a 32-year old gay Texan pornographer who engaged in consensual sexual activity with a 14-year old Ottawa, Ontario boy was charged with a single count of possessing child pornography and sentenced to time served, but noting possible legal consequences in Texas); Man Waiting for Trial in ‘Net Case, FORT MCMURRAY TODAY, Jun. 13, 2005, at 6 (noting a 26-year old Winnipeg, Manitoba man accused of sexually abusing a 14-year old Phoenix, Arizona girl he met on the internet faced a maximum sentence of 31 years in jail. teacher had sex with a former student during the summer vacation period. The court determined that the teacher, despite no longer being the student's teacher or the fact that it was summer vacation, remained in a position of authority over the underage female. Authority was generally defined as not just legal authority, but also involves a power of command or an ability to enforce obedience.

Consequently, despite Canada's age of consent law precluding sexual contact with a person under the age of fourteen, the "relationship of authority" that existed between Malcolm Watson and his fifteen year-old victim would also constitute a criminal offence in Canada.

In comparison, New York State's age of consent is definitively seventeen. New York Penal Law § 130.05, addressing age of consent, holds that a person “less than seventeen years old” is deemed incapable of consent. As such, Mr. Watson, age thirty-five, was initially charged with one count of endangering the welfare of a child and two charges of third-degree sexual abuse.

Consequently, whether in the United States or in Canada, Malcolm Watson violated the law. He endangered the health and well-being of his young victim and abused his authority by carrying on any type of sexual relationship her. The question remains, however, was Mr. Watson's conduct of the type to have him "exiled" to Canada?

50. According to New York officials, the victim was a female student attending the all girls seminary in Buffalo where Malcolm Watson taught.

The court, however, noted that where the offending male was under the age of 21 and the female between the ages of 14 and 16, a significantly less severe penalty is provided under Pen. Law § 130.20, 70.15, subd. 1).

b. The Nature of Citizenship, Immigration, & Exile

Citizenship is a basic human right. In his dissenting opinion in Perez v. Brownell, a case which declared that a person had lost his American citizenship by operation of the Immigration and Nationality Act on the ground that the petitioner remained outside the United States in order to avoid service in the armed forces of the United States and that he had voted in a political election in Mexico, Justice Warren wrote that citizenship is “man’s basic right for it is nothing less than the right to have rights.” While Perez was later overruled and Justice Warren’s notion of citizenship given new meaning; the notion of citizenship is still being scrutinized, especially in post-9/11 world. The question in this case is whether Malcolm Watson was expatriated, even temporarily, to Canada in violation of the United States Constitution and thereby stripped of his rights as a citizen.

1. Mr. Watson as a Canadian Permanent Resident (aka Landed Immigrant)

The Citizenship Act is Canada’s primary source of citizenship law. Prior to the enactment of the Canadian Citizenship Act in January 1947, people living in Canada were considered subjects of Great Britain. Beginning in 1977, The Government of Canada recognized the concept of one person holding multiple citizenships

55. Article 15 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights declares that “(1) Everyone has the right to a nationality and (2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality.” See art. 15 Universal Declaration of Human Rights at http://www.un.org/Overview/rights.html (last visited Jan. 30, 2007). and permitted Canadians to be dual citizens. Currently, the Government of Canada permits Canadians to be citizens of up to three separate countries.

A person may become a Canadian citizen in one of three basic ways: (1) by birth in Canada, (2) by birth abroad (after February 15, 1977) to a Canadian citizen parent, or (3) by naturalization. Prior to 2002, a person admitted to Canada as a non-citizen resident was classified as a “Landed Immigrant.” Currently, people admitted to Canada as a non-citizen permanent resident are classified as permanent residents. Beginning in 2002, the Government of Canada began issuing Permanent Residence Cards (aka “PR Cards”) to all existing and incoming permanent residences. This plastic, driver’s license size card bears a photo of the permanent resident, lists their place and county of birth, and notes their status in Canada. Beginning in December 2003, it became mandatory for all permanent residences in Canada to present the PR Card to Canadian immigration officials re-entering Canada.

To become a Canadian citizen by naturalization, as Mr. Watson did, an immigrant to Canada must be over eighteen years of age, have lived in Canada for three of the last four preceding years, have permanent residence status, formally apply, know about the rights and responsibilities of being Canadian, and among other things, not be under a deportation order. After three years of residence in Canada a permanent resident may be eligible to apply for Canadian Citizenship. In Mr. Watson’s case, depending on when he became a Canadian permanent resident, his criminal plea agreement may render him deportable under Canadian law absent a showing that other factors, such as having a Canadian wife and young children, outweigh his past criminal conduct in the United States. This issue is still pending as Mr. Watson appeals his deportation order from Canada.

2. Mr. Watson as a U.S. Citizen and his alleged “Exile”

Exile is, among other definitions, “the expulsion from one’s native land by authoritative decree.” However, a person may voluntarily go into exile or he may be forced into exile for other reasons. In the case at hand, Malcolm Watson accepted a plea agreement that gave him the choice: serve time in an American jail or serve three years of probation in Canada. Arguably like anyone in his position, Mr. Watson chose to be reunited with his family in Canada and left the United States. Did his departure, however, arranged and ultimately ordered by the Erie County Court, amount to exile?

Malcolm Watson is a natural born American citizen, and as such the United States Constitution protects his right to citizenship. Specifically, the Fourteenth Amendment prevents any branch of the government from stripping him of citizenship. The Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment holds that “all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to

It must be remembered that the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, after the tumult of the Civil War, was designed to award and protect the citizenship rights of newly freed slaves. (b) mandates that when the loss of nationality is put in issue, the party claiming loss has occurred has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that loss actually occurred. Moreover, any person who engages in an act of expatriation enumerated in subd. (a) shall be presumed to have done so voluntarily, but may rebut the voluntariness presumption but show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the expatriating act was not done voluntarily. Specifically, he was not a naturalized citizen of Canada, only a permanent resident. Moreover, he had not taken a formal oath or made a formal declaration of allegiance to the Government of Canada with the specific intent of relinquishing his United States citizenship.

For instance, unlike the 1979 case of Davis v. District Director, Immigration & Naturalization Service which involved a native born citizen of the United States who had served as a bomber pilot during World War II and who later voluntarily signed an oath of renunciation of United States nationality at the American Embassy in Paris stating, among other things, “I should like to consider myself a citizen of the world,”\textsuperscript{83} Mr. Watson never made or signed such a formal (or informal) renunciation of his American citizenship. Moreover, while courts in the United States have long recognized that a United States citizen may declare “temporary allegiance” to a foreign country while abroad in that they have a “duty to obey all laws of a country not immediately relating to citizenship so long as he remains in that country,”\textsuperscript{84} Mr. Watson’s United States citizenship could not be stripped because he merely lived in Canada and enjoyed the protection of the Government of Canada.

A formal declaration of allegiance to a foreign state, as noted in United States v. Matheson, requires a "knowing and intelligently intended act" to not merely take an oath, but to relinquish United States citizenship. In Matheson, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second District was asked to reverse the District Court's ruling granting summary judgment to the United States government in finding appellant estate liable for federal income taxes. The case stemmed from the death of a wealthy deceased United States citizen whose estate sought to establish, over the government's opposition, that the deceased expatriated herself. At issue was several million dollars in tax liability which the estate might escape if it could sustain the burden of showing that the deceased lost her United States citizenship. Moreover, despite the fact that the United States Constitution has no specific enumerated powers governing immigration, the Federal government, namely the United States Congress, holds the power to regulate immigration law and thereby dictate who may enter and/or remain in the United States. There are several sources of this power, scholars argue, including the Commerce Clause,\(^{92}\) the Migration and Importation Clause,\(^{93}\) the Naturalization Clause,\(^{94}\) and the War Clause.\(^{95}\) None of these clauses, however, came into play in Mr. Watson’s case. Neither Congressional enactment nor any case law supports the notion that a state municipal court such as the one in Erie County, New York, could order a native United States citizen to be expatriated based on a criminal misdemeanor. A New York Supreme Court judge\(^ {96}\) is precluded from ruling on the admission or restriction of an immigrant let alone ordering a United States citizen be banished from his own county. Moreover, it must be recalled that Mr. Watson was ordered to \textit{reappear} in the Erie County Court on a future date as a condition of his probation. As such, there is no greater evidence to support the fact he was not stripped of his citizenship than the fact that he retained his rights and privileges under the United States Constitution.

Thus, in Mr. Watson’s case, there was no such “knowing and \(^{96}\) In New York State, the “trial courts of superior jurisdiction are the Supreme Courts, the Court of Claims, the Family Courts, the Surrogate’s Courts and, outside New York City, the County Courts.” Moreover, County Courts are established in each county outside New York City. They are “authorized to handle the prosecution of all crimes committed within the County.” Other courts, such as the Town (like Cheektowaga) and Village Courts “have criminal jurisdiction over violations and misdemeanors, and civil jurisdiction over claims of up to $3,000.” New York State’s highest court is the Court of Appeal that “is composed of a Chief Judge and six Associate Judges, each appointed to a 14-year term.” See generally \textit{Introduction to the Courts, New York State Unified Court System} at http://www.courts.state.ny.us/courts/intro.shtml (last visited Feb. 2, 2007).

intelligently intended act” of renunciation before United States officials let alone an oath or declaration of allegiance to the Government of Canada specifically intended to renounce his United States citizenship. As such, the question arises, was Mr. Watson really “exiled” to Canada? In all likelihood, the answer is no. So what really happened?

The answer appears to be an attempt at a creative plea agreement which, when publicized, raised the ire of the Canadian public and, naturally, the Provincial Government of Ontario and the Federal Government of Canada. Moreover, the plea agreement drew curious glances from immigration lawyers throughout the United States. Despite its best intentions at protecting the victim, however, Mr. Watson’s plea agreement did not exile him to Canada. He retained his U.S. citizenship as well as his rights and privileges under the Constitution as evidenced by the fact he was permitted to re-enter the United States and have his rights adjudicated in a court of law.

III. Recommendations

With respect to age of consent laws, the Watson Affair highlights the fact that, in Canada sexual contact with a person under the age of sixteen should be banned outright. Sexual conduct involving a person aged sixteen to eighteen should be criminalized where the partner is over eighteen and in a relationship of authority, trust, or dependency with the young person. Moreover, in light of the ever-growing use of the internet to communicate and meet with persons under age sixteen and the ease with which an adult can travel to meet a person under the age of sixteen, Canada should raise its age of consent laws to reflect the changing

97. Local San Diego attorneys were quite surprised to learn that Mr. Watson, a United States citizen by birth, was sent to Canada to serve his probation. Considering the immigration issues which arise in many criminal cases along the Southern border, the facts of the Watson Affair were a shock and something to consider in the future.

technologies and prevent the exploitation of children by those coming from other countries with plans to engage in sexual activity in Canada with a person under age sixteen. Additionally, Canada should implement laws restricting “cross border” solicitation of young people under the age of 16 by predators outside the country.

With respect to immigration and citizenship matters and considering the apparent uniqueness of Mr. Watson’s plea agreement, United States defense attorneys, prosecutors, and judges should be mindful the international impact of the plea agreements they arrange. Whether along the Northern border with Canada or the Southern border with Mexico, United States citizens or permanent residents should be counseled on the potential impact any plea agreement may have upon them if they live and/or work across the border. As such, authorities in either Canada or Mexico should be consulted and questioned (likely by a suspect’s own attorney) in order to determine any potential negative impact.

IV. CONCLUSION

After investigating the New York laws Malcolm Watson is alleged to have violated and his subsequent plea agreement, it is evident that he committed criminal acts in the United States that were also punishable in Canada; despite the differences in the age of consent laws between the two nations. Mr. Watson’s conduct, however, neither deprived him of his American citizenship nor did the terms of the plea agreement amount to his “exile” to Canada. His conduct simply did not amount to a knowing and voluntary renunciation of United States citizenship. Moreover, a state court sitting in New York had no authority to make a determination that Mr. Watson’s actions resulted in expatriation. The fact that the length of the “exile” was limited to three years is further evidence that the term “exile” was improperly used because Mr. Watson was permitted to re-enter the United States for the express purpose of making future court appearances – a recognition that he retained legal standing and rights in his native country. As

While it appears that Erie County District Attorney contacted Canadian officials regarding Mr. Watson’s plea agreement, Frank Clark acknowledges Canadian officials were not contacted until after the plea agreement was arranged. Moreover, there is no indication Mr. Watson’s American defense attorney made any effort to determine the potential consequences for his client who lived in Canada.
such, Mr. Watson was certainly not “exiled” to Canada. Rather, the attorneys and the court, mindful of the underage female victim and in consideration of Mr. Watson’s residency in Canada, engaged in creative lawyering that, rather than sheltering his victim, propelled Mr. Watson and his young victim into a media storm.
