In a moment of reflection most editors would agree that it is the duty of a law school publication to serve in some capacity as a vehicle to air current legal problems. This would seem to follow from the very atmosphere of our universities, long the forums for new ideas. Unfortunately, however, most law reviews, including our own, have taken on a stilted format consisting in the main of articles that restate what the law is today, or was, at some time in the past. This approach allocates little or no space to views on what the law should be or what form future legal bodies or agencies should assume.

With this problem in mind, the Editors have created a new section of our Review. It will be the purpose of this section to print such thought provoking articles as Gerald M. Caplan and Earl Johnson, Jr.'s Neighborhood Lawyer Programs: An Experiment in Social Change. It is hoped that others with "something to say that needs saying" will take this opportunity to submit their carefully defined thoughts on the matter to our Review to be considered for publication.

The Editors of the University of Miami Law Review are proud to announce that we will serve as host to the Twelfth National Conference of Law Reviews to be held in Miami, Florida on March 31, and April 1, of this year.
